TARANTULA CORDYCEPS

FAMILY: CORDYCEPITACEAE CATEGORY: PARASITE
DISTRIBUTION: CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA

The tarantula cordyceps, like its close relatives the better-known Cordyceps and Ophiocordyceps, is a parasitic fungus that invades and eats the bodies of arthropods such as insects, spiders and their relatives. This species, however, has specialized in invading, manipulating the behaviour of and digesting tarantulas.

The reason these fungi are so good at parasitizing arthropods is that fungi have something important in common with these animals: chitin. Chitin is a complex and tough biopolymer; it is the material out of which arthropods make their crunchy exoskeleton and also strengthens the cell walls of fungi. This means that fungi are equipped with the cellular machinery to break down and make chitin. So, in their evolution, fungi were pre-adapted to dealing with the exoskeleton of arthropods and found this was a source of food they could exploit.

The ability to parasitize and consume insects has evolved multiple times within the fungal family tree, in several different groups of fungi. However, it is within the Cordyceps-type fungi that this lifestyle has become the most extreme and highly developed process.

- KEY CHARACTERISTICS:
- Long, fruiting body, often multiple from a single host tarantula.
 - The fruiting body is orange in colour.
 - Parasitizes, kills and eats large tropical tarantulas.
